TRANXITION

IT'S ALL THERE

To Windows 10, or Not to Windows 10? That is THE Question.

Of all the questions that keep IT decision makers up until the wee hours of the night, this is the one gets the most hits: is NOW the right time to make the move to Windows 10 enterprise adoption?

Should 2016 be the year you migrate to Windows 10 and Microsoft's new model of windows as a service?

What are the factors in deciding if you should upgrade your users to Windows 10 this year?

CIO Contributor Afzal Ballim addresses the Pros and Cons of architecting a Windows 10 migration at this stage of the OS rollout in his January 22, 2016 article: "...Then there is the question of readiness. Can we budget the upgrade this year? Gartner estimated XP to Windows 7 costs of about $1000 per user, and while those costs were probably exaggerated, there is no denying that a Windows migration is an expensive endeavor..." "is Windows 10 ready for the corporate environment." Evidently, Microsoft will say yes, but history has shown that Windows versions don't tend to be stable enough until they've gone through a first service pack...users reported the update got stuck..." Is it better to suffer the slings and arrows of botched migrations? We think not.

Now IS the right time to get onboard with Migration Manager - for Flawless Migrations and Restful Nights

Leave those sleepless nights and all that worry behind you.

Using Tranxition Migration Manager will enable you to earn significant margins on the most problematic area of IT work: OS Migrations. Combine this with the currently frenetic rate of Windows10 adoption overwhelming the marketplace (at 270 Million devices to-date and counting - read the latest from Gregg Keizer in Computerworld, April 1, 2016), AND using a tool that has a 2Sigma* reliability rating for flawless migrations, to realize that NOW is perfect timing for technology providers to take action with a tool that banks more money directly into your pocket.
